1.9GB. Duration: 3. People usually pay attention to the first few frames of a film when they first see it, but the opening. Western governments urged Russia to drop its support for Assad after a suspected chemical attack killed scores of civilians. But in doing so, they may have contributed to the crisis by provoking Russian counter-sanctions that led to more deaths. Today, the Syrian Army's assault on Aleppo has accelerated since Russia announced it would deliver air support to the Assad regime's forces. Yet, an unintended consequence of the West's rhetorical confrontations with Russia has been a cruel one. The campaign began when the government of Bashar al-Assad told its supporters that the U.S. military had just bombed its airfields. A Syrian state news agency even reported casualties from the attack. The only problem was that U.S. military officials had denied any airstrikes had taken place. Western officials denied that Russia had provoked the incident, either by supplying military assistance to the Syrian Army or by threatening to use its nuclear arsenal if the U.S. attacks Syria. However, the incident was a war crime. Under international law, the U.S. would be guilty of committing war crimes if it bombed Syrian airports and caused hundreds of civilian deaths, such as happened on Tuesday. The attack was a clear violation of international law because it attacked Syria without a UN mandate and was arguably part of an attempt to overthrow the Assad government. The West's attempt to pretend this was not a war crime, and that it was somehow provoked, led to the announcement on Wednesday that the U.S. would impose sanctions on two Russian firms, the state arms exporter Rosoboronexport and the defense contractor Kalashnikov Concern. The move would be a form of punishment for Russia's support of the Assad government. Yet, the sanctions have not stopped Russian military aid to the Syrian Army. And this support might have a disastrous effect on civilians. Moscow initially denied that it was supplying the Syrian Army with weapons. However, the U.S. has not only seen the delivery of Russian arms in Syria, but Russian civilians have told reporters that they have been involved in the air campaign. This means that the West's attack on Russia could have a far more devastating effect on Syrian civilians than the war crime of the U.S. airstrike had. By targeting Russian firms and military officers involved in the 82157476af
