Hands up if you've ever felt the need to program something that would benefit from a form of code that is wholly different to the already prevalent JavaScript model. On the face of it, it appears to be a concept taken straight from the realms of software engineering, but with the rise of a popular new programming language, we're seeing less and less JavaScript developers switching to Typescript. The same cannot be said about WebAssembly: it's a revolutionary concept when it comes to web development, allowing you to run native web applications on the web. It does this by giving the application information (such as its size and dependencies) and then compiling it down to a binary format, meaning you can store and run the application locally in the browser itself, or on a server. Two great open-source projects, BabelJS and ember-cli, are leading the charge when it comes to supporting WebAssembly, and both offer great tools to give developers the ability to use it effectively in their projects. BabelJS BabelJS is a JavaScript transpiler (not to be confused with a compiler) that lets you transform JavaScript, such as TypeScript or any other supported language, to JavaScript, which ultimately means you can use the language to write large-scale projects. But what if you're not actually writing your JavaScript in any other supported language? Enter WebAssembly. WebAssembly is a binary format for building code and isn't a JavaScript-like language, but it is compatible with JavaScript and so you can use the language to write WebAssembly. BabelJS supports WebAssembly via a unique - but powerful - technique known as Interop, which lets you translate your project to both WebAssembly and JavaScript. You can use WebAssembly on its own or with other languages, as long as your application's file is understood by WebAssembly. A very nice component is the online IDE, Codemirror. Codemirror works with WebAssembly as well as with the more

What's New in the?

Discord Rich Presences Our hacker hideouts are now online. For those that don't know us, hacker hideouts are themed rooms designed around the tech we use and try. Join now and start exploring the themes available for the server. On the 14th of August, Discord is hosting another one of their hackathons. The goal of this hackathon is to build a tool that can help you find hidden servers and game servers. We need to build a bot that can help you find servers you may have never seen before, and which ones may be good to get into. The second contest, as announced by Simon from the Community team, is an open source project contest. In this contest we want to see people build a bot that can find game servers. Both contests are good because even though the tools and projects will help people find servers on Discord, they can still take it a step further. The application can be used in many other ways, the only time it will be tested is during the hackathons, and once it's live you can find all the servers there. As this is an open source project, we want to hear about anything that needs fixing and fixing the projects. If you want to help out, you can join the Discord server and the community by signing up for the service. Also, join the discord server and join #coder-autobot. The discord server can be found here. Ever since COVID-19 hit us, everything is different. We are staying at home, the world is a bit shaken. We are working from home, spending all our time there. We are out of clubs, bars, parties. We are doing all the house work in the beginning of April. I just started working on a movie too. Ever since then we all got so busy and our screens have been full with work and rest. Later on, on the 4th of August, we will get the chance to watch "Scarecrow" and the new Live action version of "Beauty and the Beast" (2018) for the first time. It is not a big deal for the first time, it's just a
